

If the FCC stopped regulating broadband service, small ISPs would have to individually negotiate pricing and the ability to interconnect, which would undoubtedly raise their costs and ultimately their prices to me.

The more serious threat is that it is even possible that the phone companies could, in the long run, refuse to provide the necessary connections for DSL service, which would definitely impact the excellent service I currently enjoy.

Sincerely,

Allan B. Wilson